Editorial

More than three decades after the promulgation of the code 1983, actual life-experiences of the people of God has brought us to several critical questions demanding significant revision.

Burkhard J. Berkmann questions the double standards of expecting subsidiarity with regard to social teaching, while the Church is reluctant in accepting the same principle with regard to the governance of the Church.

Al. Andang L. Binawan criticises the current regulations on inter-religious marriage. The present provisions not only do not reflect the spirit of inter-religious dialogue, but also proves almost impossible to practice in an Islamic country like Indonesia.

Wim Decock acknowledges the momentous contribution canon law has made in the past to the good of the Church and highlights its influence on the development of civil law.

Rik Torfs on his part looks at the present code from the formal perspective of law and highlights some lacunae which could compromise its function as a legal instrument.

Hildegard Warnink analyzes the most significant canonical reforms since 1983, the Motu Proprio 'Mitis Iudex Dominus Iesus'. While this document set a shorter procedure in declaring nullity of marriage, it also involves several pitfalls what can lead to ambiguity.

Felix Wilfred shows how theology could be of assistance to canon law in reading the signs of the times and in formulating and re-formulating laws, in particular with regard to the distinction between ius divinum and ecclesiastical law.

These contributions lead to a critical reflection on the conception of power in the Church, and eventually imply the need to revise parts - if not the whole - Code of Canon Law. Does canon law really stands at the crossroads?
